Looking for an opportunity to present your work?

Kellogg College is organising its inaugural Graduate Symposium where students of the college will be able to show – in a series of brief and informal talks – how their research adds to the existing scholarship on a topic, in what ways it is new, and why it is exciting.

This is a great opportunity to present your research work to an interdisciplinary audience – and add a nice conference experience to your résumé! Bringing together students from all backgrounds, the symposium will show how the Kellogg community is breaking new ground in Oxford!

To be a presenter, you just need to:

- write a 150 to 200 word abstract: you are not expected to write a full paper as we all know that the break between Hilary and Trinity can be stressful. The point of the abstract is to enable us to assign individual students’ talks to the different sessions
- be enrolled in any research or taught degree, part-time or full-time: you don’t need to be a DPhil student to present
- present on any topic that you deem of interest from any discipline: this could be your dissertation topic, a paper you have written, or one you are planning – there is always something interesting that your work can show!
- talk about any aspect of your research: the theoretical perspective, the sources you are using, the methodology, the results, or a bit of everything
- present for 15-20 minutes: this simulates a typical conference schedule and will give many students the opportunity to speak, so make sure the scope of your talk fits with this time frame.

Please send your abstracts by Friday, 5 April, to Giuseppe, the MCR Academic Officer, at giuseppe.spatafora@kellogg.ox.ac.uk

We look forward to receiving your proposals!

Giuseppe Spatafora, MCR Academic Officer • Elizabeth Gemmill, Fellow of Kellogg College